There is an increasing trend in the electrical and electronics industry towards the use of printed circuit board (PCB) technology in which large numbers of interconnected circuit components are assembled on a relatively thin substrate. The trend has been extended to smaller scale devices which are not as readily adapted for inclusion on PCBs, for example, for use in hand-held communication devices, for example, pagers, and for other portable or hand-held electronic devices. Not only do some devices require a high number of electronic components, but it has become desirable to package those devices in a relatively small housing. This has led to the fabrication of flat-pack housing assemblies and other mounting devices for such devices. The size of flat-pack devices is often dictated by the flat-pack technology employed. Accordingly, there is a need in the art for a housing or mounting device which incorporates an array of electromagnetic and radio frequency (EMF and RF) shielded electronics. The present invention satisfies this need.
